The cardiac hyperpolarizing agent nicorandil was shown to have a coronary vasodilator effect in patients with stable coronary artery disease. The mechanisms involved are not fully understood, however. We examined the relation between the magnitude of coronary artery dilation after nicorandil administration and several other aspects of coronary hemodynamics in patients with coronary artery disease. We examined changes in coronary hemodynamics in 73 patients with coronary artery disease at rest and during intracoronary adenosine infusion, with adenosine half-maximal coronary vasodilator concentration (cAMP), and with intravenous dipyridamole (500 mg). Coronary artery diameter was measured at baseline and 20 minutes after intravenous nicorandil administration. After nicorandil administration, coronary artery diameter was increased significantly more in the group that had cAMP values less than or equal to the half-maximum coronary vasodilator concentration of adenosine (119.6 +/- 2.5%) than in the group that had higher cAMP values (105.8 +/- 5.4%, P = 0.04). When all patients were considered together, coronary artery diameter was increased from baseline by significantly greater values in the group that had intravenous dipyridamole responses less than or equal to the half-maximum dipyridamole coronary vasodilator concentration (107.5 +/- 3.6%) than in the group that had higher dipyridamole coronary vasodilator
